

OVERVIEW

A public health response to the opioid crisis must focus on preventing new cases of opioid addiction, early identification of opioid addicted individuals, and ensuring access to effective opioid addiction treatment, while at the same time continuing to safely meet the needs of patients experiencing pain. We support approaches that intervene all along the supply chain, and in the clinic, community and addiction treatment settings. Interventions aimed at stopping individuals from progressing down a pathway that will lead to misuse, abuse, addiction and overdose are needed. Effective primary, secondary and tertiary prevention strategies are vital. The importance of creating synergies across different interventions to maximize available resources is also critical.

AUDIENCE

This activity is intended for prescribers, primary care physicians, internal medicine physicians, obstetricians, psychologists and residents. It may also meet the needs of advanced practice providers, pharmacists, nurses and anyone working in the healthcare field who see patients suffering with pain.
